The exhibition Scale & Perception is conceived as an art installation that produces a multi-sensory experience in the visitor. It presents two “sensory artefacts”, Ginkgo and Black&White that link the perception inside the space of the gallery with the real perception of the architecture in the place. The exhibition becomes a plastic experience in itself that mixes representation and reality to show the complexity of architecture under a different point of view.

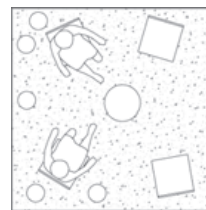

The two installations are related to two collective housing projects recently built by Casanova + Hernandez in the Netherlands. The two projects explore not only the potential of manipulating scale in design for creating a multi-sensory experience in architecture, but also rethink the phenomenological approach towards architecture to create a successful response to new global social demands putting special attention on the specific problematic of the places.

Complementing the exhibition, the catalogue promotes a reflection on the architectural mechanisms capable of transforming buildings, not only into a rich visual experience, but also into a useful tool to face the challenges of the undergoing process of urbanization of the planet, such as densification, environmental sustainability and social identity.
